Use of an in situ hybridization method to study the dynamics of DNA synthesis at different stages of lung development. The development of the fetal lung and its associated vasculature is a complex process that, in spite of its critical importance to the health of the newborn, has received little experimental attention. We have used an in situ hybridization procedure to examine the temporal and spatial patterns of cell proliferation during the development of the pulmonary circulation and lung parenchyma in rat fetuses on gestational day 16 (term approximately 20 days). Hypoxia was used to induce reactive hyperplasia of the lung parenchyma, and one of the basic helix-loop-helix (bHLH) transcription factors, the hepatocyte growth factor (HGF) target gene product E12, was used as a marker for cell proliferation. We found that: (1) bHLH-expressing cells were highly heterogeneous in their spatial distribution in the developing lung; (2) cell proliferation was detectable even at sites remote from the lung-blood interface; and (3) HGF/E12-expressing cells were detectable outside the lung and in the truncal mesenchyme during early stages of morphogenesis, indicative of an essential role for HGF signaling in the determination of this tissue. Thus, the pattern of HGF/E12 expression reflects the temporal and spatial distribution of both hypoxia-induced cell proliferation and the pattern of normal lung morphogenesis. The in situ hybridization procedure described here is therefore a powerful tool for the analysis of morphogenetic and cellular perturbation effects in the developing lung.

WBUR: “What is sexism?” A question that can be answered with any number of words and expressions, both positive and negative: personal, political, cultural, historical, and of course, academic. But how to know what sexism is? And when or where did it start? Professor Michelle Warren, author of the book “The Many Faces of Sexism: Women’s Struggles and the SCOTUS ‘Equal Rights Amendment,’” joins us on Thursday’s edition of the “All Things Considered” to explain.

Q: AngularJS: in ng-repeat, how to move up a level of nesting I am using AngularJS 1.2.8 and I am trying to loop over the fields in an object. Normally I would use an ng-repeat for this: `{{field.name}}` This works fine unless for example I have an object: `{ keys:{ "foo": { "test": "value" }, "bar": { "test": "value" }, "baz": { "test": "value" } } }` in which case my fields will be repeated twice: foo bar baz Is there a way to iterate over the keys and not the fields? I have tried with no success: `{{key}}` `{{field.name}}` Note that I know I can fix this problem by setting a variable in ng-repeat-start that is the model.keys object but I'd like to know if there is a more elegant solution.

A: If I understand you correctly, you want to use key-value pair: `{{key}}` `{{value}}`
