For indispensable reporting on the coronavirus crisis, the election, and more, subscribe to the Mother Jones Daily newsletter. We learned last week about how what should have been a peaceful protest at the State Department turned ugly when protesters arrived at the department's diplomatic office in Cairo. The demonstration was initially staged as a tribute to the four people who were killed in Benghazi, Libya, in September; some have suggested that the real objective was to embarrass Hillary Clinton, but not necessarily Obama. The Clinton campaign has dismissed the whole affair as a self-serving conspiracy, which I hope to get to in just a moment. But this incident in Egypt raises broader questions. What happens when competing visions of the world get entangled in the same election, and the country in question is of potentially significant foreign policy significance? Robert Kagan, who has not been terribly kind to Obama and Clinton—and whose The World America Makes is a comically overstated takedown of President Obama's foreign policy—says that the best response to the demonstrators' outrage at Benghazi and the killings is for Hillary Clinton to denounce the protests. "As a starting point," says Kagan, "I recommend she do something that she has never e79caf774b
